

Black & White

by Dani Shapiro

---

About the Book

For fourteen years, Clara Brodeur has cloaked herself in a cocoon of white lies and evasions in an effort to wipe out her own history. The simple life she has built with her husband and daughter in small-town Maine retains no hint of her notorious childhood in New York City, her mother's meteoric rise to international fame as a photographer—or the controversial series of nude photos of herself that she believes destroyed her life and permanently unraveled her family. But when her sister telephones with news that their mother lies near death, ravaged by lung cancer, Clara's careful façade crumbles. Suddenly, she is drawn back into her mother's force field, grappling for ways to explain the truth of her past to her young daughter while simultaneously learning how to say goodbye to the mother she wants to hate.

An eloquent look at the strange shapes love takes when stretched to the breaking point, Black & White positions its unforgettable characters at the collision point of motherhood and artistic talent, and poses the questions: what can we ask our children to endure? And what can we demand of our parents?

Discussion Guide

1. What does the book's title suggest about life's absolutes? Is it possible for moral absolutes to exist—and to survive—in a family?
2. The novel's epigraph features Walker Evans's imperative to "Stare. It is the way to educate your eye, and more. Stare, pry, listen, eavesdrop. Die knowing something. You are not here long." Does Ruth's work with Clara constitute an attempt to educate the eye? There is a vivid contrast between the immediacy of Evans's photos of Depression-era sharecroppers and the artifice of Ruth's carefully staged compositions. What do you make of Shapiro's use of the quote from Evans? Does Ruth die "knowing something"? If so, what is it?
3. When Sammy innocently suggests that they throw away all of Ruth's old magazines, Clara experiences a moment of "near-euphoric clarity" (p. 203). Why? What does the act of purging "her mother's apartment of all that is unnecessary . . . every single unessential thing" (p. 203) represent to Clara?
4. Ruth's first words to Clara, after fourteen years of silence, are "Wait a minute" (p. 14). What's the significance of this? In what ways has Ruth kept Clara waiting, or in a state of suspended animation, over the years?
5. Photographer Sally Mann's photographs of her own children, often pictured nude and in intimate settings, have been vilified as pornographic by some critics. Is Ruth meant to evoke Mann? How does the narrator describe Ruth's photographs? Do they read as beautiful? Lurid? Upsetting? To what extent is the narration sympathetic with Clara? How would the novel be different if the story were told in first person with Clara as the narrator? With Ruth as the narrator?

6. On her final circuit of the art galleries in Chelsea, Ruth suffers the devastating embarrassment of anonymity. How does her humiliation affect Clara?

7. Robin believes that she was neglected while Clara received all of Ruth's attention. How has she channeled this neglect in her adult life? Does she undergo a transformation in the course of the novel?

8. Rather than relish the memory of "the year her mother left her alone," Clara recalls the year as "blank, like a skipped page in a notebook. A mistake" (p. 164). In fact, Clara goes so far as to study the critics' reactions to this gap in Ruth's career: "Whole academic papers have been published on the subject. Clara's personal favorite, 'The Interrupted Gaze,' . . . is a psychoanalytic meditation on Ruth's work" (p. 164). Why does Clara insist on immersing herself in what is ostensibly her least favorite topic, to the extent of reading academic papers? Does her obsessive behavior affect your ability to empathize with her? Is it meant to?

9. Kubovy is certain that Nathan "would be no more than a footnote in the ultimate biography of Ruth Dunne" (p. 89). Is he right? Is Nathan merely a footnote in the novel? Why is there so little information about his death and its impact on the three women in the family?

10. The act of creating a family of her own gives Clara the opportunity to examine every nuance of her mother's behavior from a safe distance. By comparing Ruth's gaze to Jonathan's, Clara realizes that "Ruth's attention was predatory, stalking . . . Laying claim to her . . . Drowning out all that is good" (p. 123). Yet, as a mother, Clara also "knows the feeling . . . The desire to devour, the almost physical need to envelop and keep safe" (p. 133). How do these opposing insights serve Clara when she comes face-to-face with Ruth at last?

11. Ruth's claim that, "it's my work. It's not about you—it was never about you" (p. 79) astonishes Clara and sets up a staggering dividing line between the two women early in their reunion. Is this remark meant to emphasize Ruth's extreme self-absorption, or Clara's? Can this moment be considered the climax of the novel?

12. When an affronted Peony challenges Clara and Robin about their apparent disregard for Ruth's dignity, she asks "How can you not understand how lucky you are?" (p. 207). Why does the section end there, without exposing the two sisters' reactions to this question? What would their answers have been?

13. During Ruth's final hours, she begs Sam for forgiveness, mistaking the child for Clara. Clara fails to rescue her frightened daughter from this awkward scenario because "she can't help it. She wants to hear more" (p. 220). What does this scene suggest about Clara's weaknesses? Why doesn't she prompt Sam to agree to forgive the dying woman? Is Clara's reticence at this crucial moment justifiable?

14. Clara's obsession with the photographs of herself is linked to her concept of identity. As a child, they represent togetherness with her mother: "Sometimes Clara imagines that they are together in that black-and-white world, that the place inside the pictures is the real one and this—all this is just a rehearsal" (p. 52). As an adult, she is able to recognize a photo of herself from the tiniest sliver of image "because those images have always been more vivid and immediate to Clara than anything she might actually be seeing" (p. 76). What does this imply about Clara's sense of self? What shifts for Clara over the course of the novel, providing her with the emotional wherewithal to host the book party? What is the significance of her catching a glimpse of herself in the mirror in the book's final paragraph?

15. Ruth's enigmatic dedication in the book Clara reads: "To Clara and Robin, Without whom." What are some possible meanings of this phrase, beyond the obvious "without whom none of it would have been possible" (p. 255)?

16. Clara's emotional reactions to Ruth's illness ricochet from fear, "Please don't be dead" (p. 137), to dispassion, "Just die . . . Just die already" (p. 177), to guilt, "I'm killing her...it's my fault she's dying" (p. 228). What do these phrases reveal about the complexities of death in a dysfunctional family? What is Clara's emotional state at the moment of Ruth's actual death?

17. As Clara peruses a stack of photographs of herself at her mother's bedside, she is "overtaken by a violent, intense desire to rip the pictures in two" and "sits on her hands . . . to stop herself from doing something she can never take back" (p. 77). How would the novel be different if Clara had acted on this impulse? Would she be a more or less likable character? Are the photographs hers to destroy?

18. Clara's stunned reaction to being left in control of Ruth's body of work is the liberating, optimistic conclusion "She loved me" (p. 252). Do you agree that this is Ruth's posthumous message to her daughter, or might there be a more psychologically complex message at the root of her decision?

Dani Shapiro is the bestselling author of the memoirs STILL WRITING, DEVOTION and SLOW MOTION, and five novels including BLACK & WHITE and FAMILY HISTORY. Her work has appeared in The New Yorker, Granta, Tin House, One Story, Elle, The New York Times Book Review, the op-ed pages of The New York Times, The Los Angeles Times, and has been broadcast on "This American Life." Dani was recently Oprah Winfrey's guest on "Super Soul Sunday." She has taught in the writing programs at Columbia, NYU, The New School and Wesleyan University; she is co-founder of the Sirenland Writers Conference in Positano, Italy. A contributing editor at Condé Nast Traveler, Dani lives with her family in Litchfield County, Connecticut.

Critical Praise

"Spellbinding . . . provocative, hypnotic . . . spot-on authentic. A cool depiction of a mother and daughter's fraught and fiery relationship."

---

Black & White
by Dani Shapiro

Publication Date: April 3, 2007

Genres: Fiction

Hardcover: 272 pages

Publisher: Knopf

ISBN-10: 0375415483

ISBN-13: 9780375415487